A facsimile printing is performed by printing information read from a document at a facsimile transmission speed (generally 33.6 kbps) and at a facsimile reception speed (generally 9.6 kbps). This facsimile printing is a method of printing necessary information in a format as large as possible without increasing the number of prints, and is one of various types of printing. The printing paper is generally classified into two types, one is a long-size printing paper of the B4 format in which the largest effective printable area is 86.times.54 mm, and the other is a short-size printing paper of the B5 format in which the largest effective printable area is 84.times.54 mm. Normally, the document read from the facsimile transmission is printed out on the long-size printing paper, and the printed paper is cut to pieces of the same size, and then the document printed on the long-size printing paper is read into the facsimile reception, thus providing an image on the facsimile receiver. A conventional image forming

However, the conventional image forming apparatus can not print the document read from the facsimile transmission on the short-size printing paper as well as the long-size printing paper. A conventional image forming apparatus capable of printing the document read from the facsimile transmission on the short-size printing paper and capable of editing the document printed on the short-size printing paper has been proposed. For example, an image
